An important way of attracting new customers these days, is bringing them to your web site. No longer do all buyers traipse around trade shows and conferences to identify their new suppliers, collect details from each stand and file away in a brochure cabinet backat the office.

An equally popular way of selecting suppliers nowadays is to carry out a Google search, to visit supplier websites and to shortlist potential suppliers from there. To make the most of the massive opportunity offered by online marketing it's important to have the right online presence, including the development of the very best content you can for your particular subject, which will give your company the best chance it can have of appearing highly in organic search results.

There are a range of techniques for doing this, including blogs, forums and wikis as some of hte most popular. For example, the accounting software vendor Lakeview Computers, based in Bexleyheath in Kent, provides a Glossary of Accounting Software terms, which many Internet users working in the field of business management or accounting will find useful. At the agency where I work, we provide a marketing companies directory, and on this blog we provide our Graphic Design Forum, which is jsut getting off the ground. This type of website content provides useful services to end-users, who discover the content through organic search, and end up developing a relationship with your website and with your company. Then, when these users search on the Internet, they already know your website and are more likely to visit it again.

Google and the other search engines are 100% committed to listing high value, relevant listings in their search results and to eliminating spam, so it's essential to build your website content with genuine end-user value in mind. Aim to make your site the very best site on the Internet, on its particular subject.
